Conventional portable communication terminals must independently first download and then print images, since they cannot browse and print images simultaneously.

As explained hereinbelow, according to the claimed present invention, desired images are selected on a server via a portable communication terminal and are associated on the server with the portable communication terminal such that a printer may access the server through the portable communication terminal and download and print the images.

According to the present invention as recited in each of new independent claims 37-39, thumbnail images are displayed on a portable communication device, and at least one of the images is selected, to select a corresponding image(s) on a server. The selected image is related with the caller's number of the portable communication terminal and stored in association with the caller's number.

With this structure, as recited in independent claims 38 and 39, even after the portable communication terminal has disconnected from the server, the printer can reconnect to the server through the portable communication terminal and can request that the selected image be transmitted, since the image is associated with the caller's number.
